The Problem of Lack of Morality in Public Sector

The economic crisis in Europe after 2008 contributed substantially to rethink the structure of public economy, the resources and the expenses of the member states. Besides, the causes of this crisis are rather institutional than purely economic, mostly relevant to moral problems of each state, such as corruption, lack of transparency and waste of public money. This constant problem in Greece has also been of considerable concern to certain recent publications of Professor Courakis.¹

Many different forms of anti-competitive practice, such as agreements prohibited by public procurement law, predatory pricing, abuse of dominant position, are closely associated to criminal offences, such as obstructing of public tender procedures, corruption, fraud, even money laundering and misappropriation. The usual practice of illegal bribes received by political authorities in exchange for their tolerance complicates even more the problem and the research of an effective solution seems rather an illusion.
