Guide launched to ensure women's health and wellbeing needs are not missed by criminal justice staff

Today, mental health charity Together launches a new guide that offers professionals the tools to recognise and respond to the health and wellbeing needs of women offenders.

Despite recommendations made in the 2007 Corston report, around 13,500 women are still sent to prison each year<sup>1</sup>. More than half of these women have severe mental illness and the same proportion will have experienced domestic violence<sup>2</sup>. Their complex and multiple needs are often overlooked by criminal justice staff<sup>3</sup>, putting them at greater risk of re-offending.

Written by front-line forensic mental health practitioners from Together's growing Women's Court Liaison and Outreach Service, the aim of the guide is to support professionals to identify and address the needs of women offenders. It does this by giving them practical guidance on spotting potential issues, as well as the tools to refer women to specialist community-based support services that can improve their wellbeing and tackle their offending.

'A common sense approach to working with women with health and wellbeing needs in the criminal justice system' will be launched today by Vera Baird, Police and Crime Commissioner for Northumbria, at an event organised by Together and hosted by London Probation Trust. Health and criminal justice experts will meet to learn about working with women offenders and the steps they can take to ensure women have the best possible outcomes. The event includes a theatre performance that will bring the issue to life, presented by Clean Break and written and performed by graduates of the company's education programme.

Linda Bryant, Manager of Together's Criminal Justice services said: "Together's experience of working with women at court and within probation is that they are less likely to draw attention to their needs, often due to depression or anxiety or fear of the repercussions."
