PSYCHOANALYTIC THEORIES OF PSYCHOTHERAPY

DAVID L. WOLITZKY AND MORRIS N. EAGLE

To a significant extent, the history of theoretical developments in psychoanalysis can be understood as a series of successive reactions to Freudian drive theory, with its emphasis on libidinal and aggressive wishes as the primary motives for behavior. Thus, following Pine (1990), the main foci of theorizing in psychoanalysis subsequent to drive theory—ego, object, and self—can be meaningfully viewed as entailing modification or abandonment of that drive theory. These theoretical developments gave greater primacy to interpersonal and social determinants of personality development and psychopathology.

The extension of drive theory to include ego psychological considerations was begun quite early by Freud himself with the concept of defense (Freud, 1894/1962), continued with his paper, "On Narcissism" (1914/1957a) where consideration of self and object and of pre-oedipal periods of development came to the fore, and culminated with the exposition of
