our present study. However, it is of interest to know that, as late as 1914, if not to this date, a large church-bell of Dutch manufacture, dated 1616 and brought from Mangazeia, hung in a separate bell-tower at Turukhansk. Because of its size and weight, it was undoubtedly transferred via the Northern Sea Route, rather than by portage from the Taz to the Turukhan <sup>pass</sup>.

Historically speaking, the ~~fact~~ <sup>possibility</sup> remains that Mangazeia could have been a permanent and important town, and the Ob-Taz area one of the best, instead of the least-developed areas of Siberia, but for the levying of customs on trade along a route in need of encouragement. Moreover, the Northern Sea Route would have ~~been~~ become a permanent traffic artery three-and-a-quarter centuries before the Soviets brought it into being. As shall be seen, a similar short-sighted tariff policy destroyed the second effort to use the route on a large scale almost 300 years later.

After the disappearance of Mangazeia, the development of the area under our consideration virtually ceased, although entry into Siberia down the Ob from the mid-Urals crossing to Obdorsk and beyond was permitted until 1704. But following the ~~eliminate~~ elimination of Mangazeia, efforts to ~~explore~~ reach and explore the northern shores of the present Yamalo-Nenets National Okrug occurred for a long time only at intervals of a quarter to half a century. In 1690, a Russian sea captain named Rodion Ivanov navigated the Kara Bay and reached Sharapovye Koshki on the west coast of the Yamal Peninsula, about 50 miles north of the mouth of the Mutnaia River, which the old coastal route had taken inland to the portage. However, here he suffered shipwreck. But in 1730 a group of Obdorsk Russians made a pilgrimage by sea to the Serevetski Monastery on the islands of Arkhangelsk.

The next voyage in this area took place ~~a full 44 years later~~, when in 1734, ~~then~~ the Great Northern Expedition, conceived by Peter the Great, and commanded ~~by~~ by a Dane long resident in Russia, Vitus Bering, but staffed overwhelmingly by Russians, began its epic work of mapping the north ~~and~~ coasts of Russia in the most extensive single expedition in history. Group One of the expedition, including Muravev, Pavlov and later Malygin and Skuratov, mapped the coast from Arkhangelsk to the Ob, over a five year period. Group Two, commanded by Lieut. D. Ovtstyn, was assigned the task of advancing from the Ob mouth to that of the Yenisei
